Answers:

We can see from this person's soul group of origin that this person has the motivation to help others to heal (especially those experiences that she herself has overcome.)

For this soul, the underlying desire in helping others to heal is personal empowerment and transformation (this is shown in the person's Archangelic realm of training.) This client will desire to encourage others to reach their own potential and live a more authentic life that aligns with the inner self.

Another energy that is present in this person's soul profile is the 'catalyst for change' archetype – this is someone who can help others to change their lives. In addition, this person is easy to relate to, intuitive and has a sense of humour which is most likely expressed in her work.

Those who have the healing archetype through the Blueprint Changer soul group can be very drawn to emotional healing. If the client also has the fourth Archangelic realm of training then this can serve to emphasize the emotional healing aspect, and will bring soothing energies into the mix. This client on the other hand has the seventh Archangelic realm of training and as a result her approach is likely to be more of a 'kick in the pants' kind of energy: this person helps others to heal by shaking things up, which then brings healing. This is very different from the healing energy brought by the Raphaelite and this is worth pointing out to the client that her approach may be a little different from the average healer.

Because of this direct approach, perhaps this client would be effective as a life coach. This person might be a healer who helps to empower others as part of their physical healing, such as a nutritionist or a fitness specialist/personal trainer who empowers others with information or techniques to improve health.

Also note that there are three indicators in this person's soul profile which point us towards energy healing such as Reiki — first the Blueprint Changer soul group gives the soul a desire to help others to heal. The seventh Archangelic realm of training has an aspect to it which is about moving energy around the body. Then the soul training Master of design (biology and botany) gives a soul an innate understanding of energy anatomy and the chakra system.

There are many possibilities here — we wouldn't know which ones really are applicable until we tune in to the client or her Spirit Guide team.
